It introduces students to the Bible as a framework for thinking and evaluating

Adventist schools are "cities of refuge" for many of our young people living in a broken world full of moral decay such as drug, abuse, alcoholism and immorality.

Adventist schooling at its best leads a person to a lifelong dedication of service to others.

WHY

ADVENTIST

EDUCATION

Adventist schooling helps students to view every topic from philosophic perspective of Scriptures.

Is to bring young people together in sufficient numbers so that they can make lifelong friends and meet spouses who share their vision of what important in life.

Prepares young people for this life and for the life to come. Our young people can be "taught" into the kingdom of God.

Lessons are best learned when students hear the same message at school, home and church.

Men sow the seed from which above their graves, others reap blessed harvests. They plant trees, that others may eat the fruit.

They are content here to know that they have set in motion agencies for good in the hereafter the action and reaction of all these will be seen. EGW, Education, 305-306

Importance of Adventist Education in PARTNERSHIP Home-Church-School

Parenting		A strong family faith traditions and good relationships within the family provoked positive memories and were great vehicles of ensuring maximum faith transmission.
Communication		Open, supportive communication within the family, the school and the church were important as well as nurturing effective decision making skills appropriate to their personal development.
Role Model		Meaningful devotional life should be modelled at home, encouraged by teachers, and become an aspect of our church life.
Service for Others		Service opportunities are an important aspect of enhancing faith. In fact the families who had specifically had a service focus at home had kept all their children in the church and were all active Christians in their community.
Parent - Teacher Association		The ultimate goal is to have all church members enlisted to promote Adventist education, and operated properly, the Parent-Teacher Association would be a tremendous blessings to our schools, churches and pastors

The Valuegenesis Research states Adventist education shows that having quality homes, churches and schools increases the possibility of children and young adults of both growing in faith and being committed to the Seventh-day Adventist message, lifestyle and mission of the church. The longer one is involved in Adventist education, the more loyal and mature one's faith generally becomes.

VALUEGENESIS

If the home does it alone, then 36% chance of passing on faith. If the home, church and school work together, then a 71% chance almost double the chance of keeping them in the church.

"The school should be a church during the week."

Home, school and church; parents, teachers and pastors: "A threefold cord is not quickly broken."
